All these articles are part of the 1991 Sudanese Criminal Law. These charges carry prison sentences ranging from six months to 10 years. However, according to the students' lawyers these charges are likely to be dropped.

These students were recently expelled and suspended from University of Khartoum due to their involvement in anti-government protests at the university which followed reports that the government was planning to sell some of the university's buildings. They were arrested on 5 May at the lawyer's office while seeking legal advice to challenge their expulsion and suspension from the university.
